you much of a biography of her—but she is working now with Alice Brady in "Anna Ascends," at the Long Island studie. Nobody knows whether she is married or not, but every one in the studies wonders about the fact that she always wears a wedding ring and refuses to take it off. If her part makes such a ring inadmissible, she cleverly conceals it with grease paint—but she won't remove it. And she won't explain it. I don't know whether it's a romance or a tragedy—or just clever publicity. But it's interesting.

A glass of water and a piece of thread are exhibited, and the request is made to suspend the tumbler by the thread. this, tained. I say the theory is that The task appears an impossible one, but becomes quite simple when a few extra articles are introduced.

Attach the thread to the back of an ordinary playing card, using court plaster, scaling wax, gum or some such substance for the purpose. Then place the card, face down, on the tumbler, which should be tilled to the brim, and press down on the center of the card so as to press out all air. The card tumbler and all may then be quite easily lifted by the thread. Coparight, 1982, by Public Ledger Compan
